

10,000 CENTRES.

EVERY CITY. EVERY COUNTRY. ONE VISION.

"Racquetball is the greatest game God has ever given to the world - and it's time the world knows it."

- Ross Harvey

FROM NDG TO THE WORLD.

CHAMPION. ENTREPRENEUR. VISIONARY. BUILDER.

NuVoWay
LIFESTYLE CENTRES

THE MISSION:
Elevate Racquet Sports.
Transform Lives. Impact the World.

Crazy Like a Fox.

Against All Odds

From World Champion to a Vision for 10,000 NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres

Ross Harvey

Foreword

From a Mountain Vision to the Transformation of World Sport

There are moments in history when a life is no longer just a life—it becomes a corridor through which something larger is allowed to pass.

This is one of those stories.

It begins not in stadiums filled with applause, nor in boardrooms filled with strategy, but in the quiet forming of a boy who carried within him something he could not yet name. A talent, yes. A discipline, yes. But deeper still—a restlessness that would not let him settle for ordinary definitions of success.

What follows is not simply the chronicle of an athlete who rose, fell, and rose again. It is the unfolding of a vision that would not stay contained within personal achievement. A vision that moved from muscle and court lines into meaning, from competition into calling, from sport into something that resembles purpose itself.

Against All Odds is the story of how greatness is not always fulfilled where it is first expected... and how sometimes what looks like delay is actually preparation.

It is the story of a mountain moment—when silence became instruction, and instruction became destiny.

And it is an invitation to the reader: to consider that what begins in one life can, in time, be meant for many.

Introduction

The View From the Mountain

There are places in a life where everything changes—not because the world becomes louder, but because something within becomes still enough to hear what was always speaking.

For me, that place was a mountain.

It was not a mountain I climbed in strength. It was a mountain I entered in surrender. And somewhere in the quiet of those days—removed from ambition, performance, and identity—I began to see something that had always been there, waiting beneath the noise of achievement.

I saw that the story of my life was never meant to end with trophies.

I saw that sport was never just sport.

And I saw that what had been given to me—every victory, every disappointment, every redirected path—was forming something larger than I could have planned.

From that place, the vision came in fragments at first. Not as a business plan. Not as a strategy. But as a picture—of people, communities, and places where sport and life were no longer separated... where healing, joy, excellence, and connection were woven together.

It was as though I was being shown not what I had done, but what I was meant to build.

And once you see something like that, you cannot unsee it.

This book is the unfolding of that seeing.

1. The Boy Who Found a Miracle in a Gymnasium

There are moments in a life that do not announce themselves as sacred.

They arrive quietly, wrapped in the ordinary fabric of a day that seems no different from any other.

And yet, in hindsight, they become the turning points—the hidden hinges upon which entire destinies swing open.

For a young boy in Montreal, that moment came at the age of twelve.

It was the day he first stepped into a YMCA gymnasium and discovered a sport he did not yet have a name for in his soul, but would one day come to define his calling on the earth.

The Canadian Racquetball Championships had come to town.

There was no expectation that anything extraordinary would happen. Just the curiosity of a young boy wandering into a building filled with energy, noise, and movement.

But something shifted the moment he entered.

The sound struck first—the sharp echo of a small rubber ball rebounding off glass and walls at impossible speeds. It was not just noise. It was rhythm. Precision. Warfare disguised as play.

Then came the movement.

Athletes who seemed to defy logic. Explosive acceleration. Sudden stops. Angles that bent space in ways a young mind could not yet calculate but instinctively admired.

And then came the silence within.

That strange internal quiet that sometimes descends when something important is happening beneath the surface of understanding.

The boy stood still.

Watching.

Absorbing.

Something inside him recognized something the mind had not yet learned how to articulate:

This matters.

Not because anyone told him so.

Not because it was famous.

But because it felt alive.

He did not leave that gym the same.

Something had been placed inside him—small at first, almost imperceptible—but unmistakably real.

A seed.

A curiosity that would not leave him alone.

A fascination that would grow into discipline.

And eventually, into destiny.

Long before medals, titles, or world championships, there was this moment.

A boy.

A gymnasium.

And a sport that would quietly begin to reshape the trajectory of his life.

2. Rising Through the Ranks

Some call it talent.

Others call it discipline.

But in truth, the making of a champion is something more mysterious than either.

It is what happens when fascination refuses to fade.

After that first encounter at the YMCA, racquetball did not remain a passing interest.

It became a pull.

A gravitational force.

A place the mind kept returning to even when life tried to move it elsewhere.

The boy began to play—not occasionally, but relentlessly. Not as a hobby, but as though something within him already knew this was not optional.

He studied the game the way others studied language. He learned its angles, its rhythms, its psychology. He began to understand that racquetball was not simply a sport of speed, but of anticipation—of seeing what others could not yet see.

And slowly, something began to emerge.

Results.

Then recognition.

Then reputation.

By his mid-teens, he was no longer simply participating in the sport. He was becoming one of its defining junior players in Eastern Canada—and increasingly, across the competitive circuits of the United States.

There is a strange threshold every serious athlete crosses —the moment when imagination stops asking “Could I?” and begins to quietly assume “I must.”

He crossed that threshold early.

And once crossed, there is no returning to innocence.

Competition became more than events on a calendar. It became identity shaping. Character forming. A proving ground where resilience mattered as much as skill.

Every match carried weight.

Every loss sharpened him.

Every victory expanded expectation.

And somewhere in the middle of this rising trajectory, a door opened that would take him far beyond his home city.

San Diego.

3. Chasing Greatness in California

There are moments in an athlete's life when the path stops being theoretical.

When potential is no longer an idea spoken about by others, but a lived reality measured in courts, opponents, and the unforgiving clarity of performance.

For him, that moment came with a decision that would alter everything.

California.

San Diego.

The centre of gravity for elite racquetball at the time—where the best did not gather occasionally, but lived, trained, and competed as a way of life.

It was not simply a change of geography.

It was a crossing.

From promise to pressure.

From local recognition to global comparison.

He arrived not as a finished product, but as a student entering the most demanding classroom imaginable.

And the lesson began immediately.

The pace was faster than anything he had known.

The players sharper, more experienced, more efficient in every movement.

There was no space to hide weaknesses. Every hesitation was exposed. Every pattern was studied. Every predictable habit punished.

Yet it was here that something deeper began to form within him.

A resilience that could not be taught in comfortable environments.

A clarity that only emerges when survival depends on adaptation.

Day by day, match by match, he absorbed the realities of elite competition.

And slowly, he stopped trying to prove himself.

He started trying to understand the game itself at its highest level.

That shift—subtle but profound—marked the beginning of transformation.

He was no longer chasing recognition.

He was chasing mastery.

The professional tour became his proving ground.

Airports. Gyms. Courts that looked identical but carried entirely different pressures. Opponents who knew each other's tendencies like old friends, yet competed like strangers.

Losses came.

Not as failure, but as instruction.

Wins came too.

Not as arrival, but as confirmation that something inside him was still evolving.

And in that rhythm of travel and competition, something else was quietly forming.

A question that would not leave him alone.

Is this the summit?

Or is this only the training ground for something I cannot yet see?

He did not know it yet, but that question would follow him beyond California, beyond Denver, beyond even the moment of becoming a world champion.

Because some questions are not meant to be answered in achievement.

They are meant to prepare the heart for calling.

4. Denver and the Road to the Summit

If San Diego was acceleration, Denver was refinement.

A different altitude. A different rhythm. A different kind of clarity.

Here, the noise of constant comparison began to fade, and something more internal emerged.

The athlete was no longer simply reacting to the demands of the tour.

He was beginning to observe it.

To study patterns.

To understand not only how to win, but why certain players sustained excellence while others flickered briefly before disappearing.

It was a period of consolidation.

A season where raw talent was being shaped into seasoned capability.

Travel continued.

Competition continued.

But beneath it all, something deeper was shifting.

The early fire of ambition had not diminished—but it was beginning to be joined by reflection.

And reflection changes everything.

Because it introduces awareness beyond performance.

It asks not only “How do I win?” but “What am I becoming through this process?”

During this time, victories mattered—but they no longer fully satisfied.

Losses mattered—but they no longer defined.

Something larger was forming beneath both.

A sense of trajectory.

A quiet recognition that his life was not random.

That the path, while unpredictable, was not without direction.

And then came the culmination of this athletic arc.

1984.

Sacramento, California.

The World Championships.

The stage where everything he had trained for, endured, and refined would be tested in its purest form.

There are competitions that feel like games.

And then there are competitions that feel like thresholds.

This was the latter.

Every match carried weight. Every point mattered. Every moment demanded presence at the highest possible level.

And when the final result came, it confirmed what few achieve and even fewer sustain:

He had reached the pinnacle.

World Champion.

A title that, on the surface, appears to complete a story.

But in reality, often begins a new one.

Because once you stand at the top of what you thought was the mountain, you begin to see what lies beyond it.

And what he began to see was not more trophies.

But something far less tangible.

A sense that accomplishment, while meaningful, was not ultimate.

That there was still a missing piece.

Not in the game.

But in the purpose behind the game.

5. World Champion

Sacramento did not feel like an ending.

It felt like a reveal.

As though a curtain had been pulled back, not to conclude a performance, but to show that the stage was larger than anyone had realized.

Becoming World Champion changed everything on the outside.

But on the inside, it introduced a quiet tension.

Because achievement has a strange effect when it arrives before meaning feels complete.

It confirms ability.

But it does not always answer identity.

It validates effort.

But it does not always clarify direction.

In the days that followed, there was celebration.

Recognition.

A sense of arrival that others naturally projected onto him.

But internally, something more reflective was beginning to form.

A question that would grow louder over time:

If I have reached this level, why does it feel like I have not yet arrived at the place I am meant to be?

It was not dissatisfaction.

It was discernment.

A subtle awareness that success in sport had not resolved the deeper questions of purpose.

And it is often in this space—between achievement and meaning—that life quietly prepares its most important shifts.

For him, that shift would come later.

Not immediately.

Not dramatically.

But gradually, through the next chapter of life.

Returning to Montreal.

Entering university.

Stepping toward veterinary studies.

And eventually, through a journey far less visible than championships or trophies, finding himself alone on a mountain in December of 2003.

Seven days that would reframe everything that came before them.

And everything that would follow.

But for now, he was simply a World Champion returning home.

Carrying a title the world understood.

And a question only he could hear.

6. Veterinary Medicine and the Fork in the Road

There are seasons in life when success becomes familiar.

Not in a way that diminishes it, but in a way that removes its surprise.

You begin to understand what it takes. You understand what it feels like. You understand what it costs.

And once that understanding settles in, the question shifts.

Not Can I achieve more?

But Is this all I am meant to achieve?

After reaching the summit of world racquetball, life did not pause to interpret the moment. It simply continued forward, as life always does.

And so he returned to Montreal.

Not away from purpose—but toward another kind of formation.

Concordia University became part of the new rhythm. A different arena, less visible, but no less demanding in its own way.

Here, the court was replaced by classrooms. Competition by curriculum. Travel schedules by study schedules.

And yet, beneath the surface, the athlete had not disappeared.

He had simply stepped into a quieter phase of becoming.

There was another direction forming in parallel.

Veterinary medicine.

A calling shaped not by sport, but by care. By science. By a desire to understand life from the inside out, not just performance on the outside in.

Eventually, this path led to one of the most significant academic milestones of his life: acceptance into the Ontario Veterinary College at Guelph University.

It was a different kind of victory.

One that did not involve trophies or championships, but discipline, intelligence, and long-term commitment.

A five-year journey toward becoming a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine began.

And for a time, it seemed as though this would be the next defining chapter.

A life in science.

A life in practice.

A life that, on the surface, appeared to be a departure from the intensity of professional sport.

But life rarely separates its threads as cleanly as we imagine.

Because even as he moved deeper into veterinary studies, something else remained alive.

Racquetball.

Squash.

Golf.

Not as distraction, but as expression.

And so a dual identity began to form.

The student of life and science.

And the practitioner of sport and performance.

Two worlds.

Two disciplines.

Two callings—existing in tension, yet not in conflict.

What became increasingly clear over time was that neither could fully contain him.

After graduation, rather than stepping fully into veterinary practice, he made a decision that surprised some and clarified others.

He chose movement over permanence.

Teaching. Competing. Coaching. Playing.

Becoming a professional in racquetball, squash, and golf.

Not abandoning one path for another.

But integrating them.

The analytical mind of science.

The instinctive intelligence of sport.

The discipline of both.

And yet, even here, something was forming beneath the surface.

Because achievement—even multi-dimensional achievement—still did not fully answer the deeper question that had begun to quietly surface years earlier:

What is all of this ultimately for?

That question would not remain theoretical for long.

It would become the doorway into the most defining experience of his life.

A moment not measured in scores or degrees or titles.

But in stillness.

In solitude.

In encounter.

December 2003.

Seven days on a mountain with God.

7. Two Passions, One Purpose

Before the mountain, there was motion.

Life had become a weaving of disciplines, each one sharpening a different edge of who he was becoming.

On one side was the athlete.

On the other, the teacher.

On another, the emerging professional in sport development.

Racquetball remained central—not as a career ambition alone, but as something closer to identity.

Squash refined precision.

Golf refined patience.

Racquetball refined everything else.

There is something unique about sports that require enclosed space, rapid decision-making, and constant adjustment. They train the mind to process complexity in real time. They reveal character under pressure. They expose hesitation, and reward clarity.

He understood this deeply now—not just as a player, but as a teacher of the game.

And so his life became a form of stewardship.

Passing on what he had learned.

Refining others.

Building understanding in those who were just beginning their own journeys.

Yet even in this season of contribution, there was an undercurrent he could not ignore.

A sense that all of these arenas—sport, education, performance, leadership—were not separate callings, but fragments of a larger design.

A pattern not yet fully visible.

There were moments when it almost came into focus.

But then life would continue, and the clarity would recede again into the background.

Until finally, it stopped being background at all.

And became invitation.

Not to do more.

But to go somewhere else.

Somewhere quieter.

Somewhere higher.

Somewhere removed from the noise of achievement and expectation.

A mountain.

Not metaphorically.

But physically.

And spiritually.

December 2003 would become that threshold.

Seven days that would not add to his résumé.

But would redefine the meaning of the résumé entirely.

8. Seven Days on the Mountain With God

There are experiences in life that resist explanation.

Not because they are unclear.

But because they are too clear to be contained in ordinary language.

This was one of them.

Seven days.

A mountain.

Silence.

Solitude.

And an encounter that would become the defining internal reference point for everything that followed.

He did not go there to build a vision.

He did not go there to design a strategy.

He went there, as many do in such moments, carrying questions that had grown too large for everyday life to answer.

Questions about direction.

About meaning.

About legacy.

About why certain things seemed unfinished, even after significant achievement.

And then something shifted.

Not suddenly.

But steadily.

As though the noise of a lifetime began to thin, layer by layer, until something deeper could finally be heard.

A stillness that was not emptiness.

But presence.

And in that stillness, a vision began to form.

Not as an image alone.

But as understanding.

Racquetball was not, as many had treated it, a minor sport.

It was a gift.

A structured expression of athletic intelligence, accessibility, speed, and human engagement that carried within it a unique capacity to transform health, community, and global participation.

And with that understanding came something even larger.

A sense of assignment.

Not ambition.

Assignment.

That what had been given to him through decades of experience, competition, teaching, and leadership was not accidental.

It was preparation.

For something vast.

Something global.

Something that would require not just skill, but endurance.

Not just vision, but conviction.

Not just belief in possibility, but willingness to stand for it when it appears impossible.

And what began to emerge over those seven days was not a plan in the conventional sense.

It was a horizon.

A picture of what could be.

A world where racquetball—and racquet sports more broadly—were not marginal, but central.

Not hidden in corners of recreation centres.

But embedded in communities across nations.

Accessible.

Beautiful.

Inviting.

Alive.

A network of centres that would one day number not in dozens or hundreds, but in thousands.

Ten thousand.

Across cities.

Across countries.

Across cultures.

A global ecosystem of movement, health, connection, and joy.

At the time, it did not feel like imagination.

It felt like clarity.

The kind that does not ask for permission.

Only response.

And yet, even as the vision expanded, so did the awareness of its cost.

Because visions of this scale do not unfold easily.

They require time.

They require resilience.

They require belief that does not fade when circumstances do not immediately align.

And most of all, they require a life willing to carry something larger than personal achievement.

When the seven days ended, nothing external had changed.

He returned to the same world.

The same responsibilities.

The same systems.

But internally, something irreversible had taken place.

A line had been crossed.

A call had been received.

And from that moment forward, life would no longer be lived simply as a sequence of accomplishments.

But as a response.

To what had been seen on the mountain.

9. God's Gift to Humanity

There are ideas that belong to individuals.

And there are ideas that feel larger than the individuals who receive them.

The vision that emerged on the mountain in December 2003 did not carry the weight of personal ambition. It carried the texture of something older. Something purposeful. Something meant to be shared.

At its center was a simple but profound conviction:

Racquetball—and the broader family of racquet sports—was not an overlooked pastime.

It was a gift.

A gift of movement.

A gift of accessibility.

A gift of intensity without violence.

A gift of joy within structure.

A gift of health that could be renewed at any age.

And when viewed through that lens, the sport was no longer small.

It was essential.

Not because of its history.

But because of its potential.

In that clarity, something else became visible as well.

The environments in which sport is experienced matter as much as the sport itself.

A game played in a cold, forgotten basement court feels different from a game played in a space designed to inspire life, beauty, and belonging.

And so the vision began to expand beyond the sport itself.

Toward place.

Toward architecture.

Toward community.

Toward something that would eventually take shape as the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres.

These would not be conventional sports facilities.

They would be living environments.

Spaces where movement, health, wellness, social connection, and inspiration could coexist naturally.

Where children would discover sport for the first time.

Where families would gather not out of obligation, but joy.

Where older generations would remain active and connected.

Where elite athletes would train alongside beginners without separation of spirit.

The sport was the entry point.

But the experience was the transformation.

And through that transformation, something larger could happen:

People would begin to move again.

Together.

Consistently.

Joyfully.

Not as an obligation to fitness.

But as a return to something deeply human.

10. Seeing What Others Could Not See

Every movement in history begins with perception before it becomes reality.

At first, what is seen by one person is invisible to everyone else.

Not because it is not real.

But because it has not yet been built.

The vision of NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres existed first in this unseen space.

A fully formed picture in the mind and spirit of what sport environments could become when they are designed not only for function, but for human flourishing.

To most observers, racquetball at the time appeared to be in decline.

Participation was shrinking.
Facilities were aging.
Attention was shifting elsewhere.

But within the vision received on the mountain, decline was not the defining truth.

Potential was.

And potential has a different language than statistics.

It speaks in possibility.

In design.

In reimagined systems.

In the willingness to ask:

What if this were not a dying sport, but an undiscovered global opportunity?

What if the very characteristics that made racquetball niche were the same characteristics that could make it universally accessible if properly presented?

Fast learning curve.

Minimal equipment barriers.

Indoor availability.

High intensity in short duration.

Suitable for all ages.

In that reframing, what once appeared marginal began to look strategic.

And what once appeared limited began to look scalable.

But seeing this clearly created a new kind of challenge.

Because vision does not automatically generate agreement.

Often, it generates resistance.

Not because others oppose it.

But because they cannot yet see it.

And so the burden of early vision is often silence.

Not persuasion.

Not validation.

But endurance.

The willingness to hold what has been seen long enough for reality to eventually catch up.

And in the case of NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres, that would mean holding a picture of thousands of centres across nations while standing in a world where none yet existed.

Ten thousand centres.

Not as exaggeration.

But as horizon.

A scale large enough to require faith, strategy, time, and generations of participation.

11. From Near Oblivion to Global Phenomenon

Movements rarely begin at the moment of success.

They begin at the moment of contradiction.

When what is true in vision does not yet match what is visible in reality.

Racquetball, at the time of the vision, sat in that tension.

A sport rich in depth, speed, and intelligence—but under-recognized, under-developed in infrastructure, and under-expressed in global culture.

And yet, within the vision, this was not a terminal state.

It was an invitation.

Because transformation always begins with reframing.

Not asking how to preserve what exists.

But asking how to evolve what exists into what it is meant to become.

The path from near-oblivion to global phenomenon would not be driven by a single breakthrough.

It would be driven by systems.

Centres.

Communities.

Accessibility.

Visibility.

And repetition of experience at scale.

This is where the concept of the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres becomes foundational.

Because without physical environments designed for mass participation, even the most beautiful vision remains theoretical.

But with them, everything changes.

Each centre becomes a local ignition point.

A place where individuals discover the sport for the first time.

Where young athletes are formed.

Where communities gather.

Where health is not prescribed but practiced.

And multiplied across cities, these centres begin to form a network.

Not of competition.

But of connection.

And networks, once established, do something extraordinary.

They scale naturally.

They replicate identity.

They carry culture.

And over time, what begins as isolated points of engagement becomes a global movement.

Not imposed.

But lived.

And in that way, racquetball—and its expanded ecosystem of racquet sports and wellness activity—shifts from a fragmented presence to a unified global identity.

Not as nostalgia.

But as renewal.

12. The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres Vision

If there was a single architectural expression of the mountain vision, this would be it.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres.

Not buildings alone.

But environments designed around a central philosophy:

That human beings thrive when movement, beauty, community, and purpose are brought into alignment.

These centres are imagined not as warehouses of courts and equipment, but as living ecosystems.

Spaces where light, water, greenery, and open design principles are integrated into the sporting environment.

Where arriving feels like entering a different rhythm of life.

Not rushed.

Not fragmented.

But intentional.

Inside, racquet sports serve as the heartbeat.

Racquetball, squash, and related disciplines provide the dynamic core.

But around them, something broader emerges:

Wellness spaces.

Community gathering areas.

Learning environments.

Social connection hubs.

Family-oriented activity zones.

The intention is not specialization.

It is integration.

Because the vision is not merely to produce athletes.

It is to produce healthier human beings.

More connected communities.

More engaged families.

More active aging populations.

More accessible pathways to joy through movement.

And when multiplied globally, the result is not just a sports network.

It is a lifestyle network.

A cultural infrastructure.

A new way of organizing recreation and community life.

Ten thousand NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres.

Across cities.

Across countries.

Across continents.

Each one adapted locally.

But unified in purpose.

A global expression of movement, health, and connection.

What began on a mountain in December 2003 was no longer simply a personal vision.

It had become a framework for possibility.

And from this point forward, the book moves from vision into expansion:

How it spreads.

How it grows.

How it changes sport culture.

And how it redefines what it means to build community through movement.

13. Cathedrals of Sport

There are buildings that house activity.

And then there are spaces that shape experience.

Most sports facilities belong to the first category—functional, efficient, and forgettable once the activity ends.

But every once in a while, a different idea emerges.

That a place of movement can also be a place of meaning.

That architecture can elevate not just performance, but perception.

And that sport, when placed inside beauty, becomes something closer to reverence.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres were never intended to be ordinary recreational facilities.

They were imagined as cathedrals of sport.

Not in a religious sense of structure.

But in the deeper sense of atmosphere.

Spaces where people feel something shift the moment they enter.

Light becomes intentional.

Not accidental.

Air feels alive.

Not stagnant.

Water, greenery, openness—these are not decorative features.

They are part of the emotional language of the environment.

Because human beings do not only respond to function. They respond to feeling.

And feeling shapes participation.

Inside these centres, racquet sports are not hidden in the background of life.

They are celebrated in visible, inviting, transparent environments.

Glass courts where movement can be seen, not concealed.

Open walkways where spectators become participants in spirit.

Spaces designed so that curiosity becomes entry.

And entry becomes engagement.

In this way, the environment itself becomes a teacher.

It says silently:

You belong here.

You are welcome here.

You can begin here.

And over time, something remarkable happens.

People stop thinking of sport as something they must be good at before they can enter it.

They begin to see it as something they enter in order to become.

That shift is subtle.

But it is transformative.

Because it removes the barrier of perfection before participation.

And replaces it with invitation.

14. The New Community Hubs

Every society has gathering places.

Some are commercial.

Some are cultural.

Some are incidental.

But very few are intentionally designed to serve the full spectrum of human life.

The vision of the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres was not limited to athletic development.

It was rooted in something broader:

Community regeneration.

At their core, these centres are designed to function as living hubs.

Places where multiple generations intersect naturally.

Where children learn through play.

Where adults reconnect through activity.

Where older generations remain engaged rather than isolated.

The racquet sports courts provide energy and structure.

But around them, life expands.

Spaces for conversation.

Spaces for learning.

Spaces for wellness.

Spaces for recovery.

Spaces for connection.

In this model, sport is not the end.

It is the catalyst.

A shared language that allows people to meet without pretense.

Because on a court, status dissolves.

Age becomes less relevant.

Background becomes secondary.

What remains is presence.

Movement.

Attention.

Engagement.

And from that shared experience, community begins to rebuild itself.

Not through programming alone.

But through repetition of shared life.

Day after day.

Week after week.

Year after year.

The centre becomes part of the rhythm of a neighbourhood.

Not an occasional destination.

But a daily environment.

And when that happens, something deeper begins to shift.

Loneliness decreases.

Health improves.

Families reconnect.

Children grow up in movement-rich environments.

Adults rediscover play.

Seniors rediscover vitality.

This is not sport as entertainment.

This is sport as infrastructure for human flourishing.

15. A Sport for Every Nation

There are ideas that remain local.

And there are ideas that are designed—by their nature—to travel.

The vision of racquet sports, expressed through the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres, belongs to the second category.

Because its foundation is not cultural specificity.

It is human universality.

Movement.

Play.

Challenge.

Connection.

These are not regional preferences.

They are shared human instincts.

And when a system is built on instincts rather than trends, it can cross borders without losing its identity.

The expansion envisioned is not aggressive.

It is organic.

It begins with awareness.

Then demonstration.

Then replication.

A single centre becomes a model.

A model becomes a blueprint.

A blueprint becomes a movement.

And a movement becomes infrastructure.

Across nations, the expression will vary.

Some centres will be urban and vertical.

Others open and landscape-integrated.

Some focused heavily on youth development.

Others emphasizing wellness and aging populations.

But the core remains consistent:

Accessible racquet sports.

Integrated wellness.

Community connection.

Movement as daily life.

In this way, the sport is no longer dependent on elite recognition alone.

It becomes locally relevant.

Globally adaptable.

And structurally sustainable.

And as each new nation adopts the model in its own way, something unexpected begins to occur.

Racquet sports stop being “a niche category.”

They begin to resemble a universal activity system.

One that sits alongside running, swimming, and cycling— not as competitors, but as complements.

And in that shift, the original vision begins to take shape:

Not just more players.

But more participation.

Not just more events.

But more daily engagement.

Not just a sport.

But a global movement of movement.

16. The Technology Revolution

Every great expansion in human history has depended on more than vision.

It has depended on infrastructure that makes the vision repeatable.

Roads turned empires into networks.

Printing turned ideas into movements.

Broadcasting turned events into global experiences.

The internet turned communication into instant connectivity.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres vision sits at the intersection of all of these historical shifts.

Because it is not only about buildings or sport.

It is about scalability of human experience.

Technology becomes the quiet accelerator beneath the surface of the entire system.

At the simplest level, it begins with visibility.

People must be able to see what is happening inside these centres—not occasionally, but constantly.

Live-streamed matches.

Training progressions.

Community events.

Youth development pathways.

Health and wellness programming.

When experience becomes visible, curiosity increases.

When curiosity increases, participation follows.

But technology does something deeper than visibility.

It creates continuity.

A child in Montreal can see a training pathway mirrored in Denver.

A coach in Europe can share methodology with a centre in Asia.

A professional match can inspire a beginner halfway across the world in real time.

The sport stops being geographically contained.

It becomes globally shared.

Training systems become digitized.

Progress tracking becomes personalized.

Coaching insights become distributed.

Best practices become instantly transferable.

And perhaps most importantly, storytelling becomes central.

Because movements are not sustained by infrastructure alone.

They are sustained by narrative.

The story of transformation must be seen, heard, and felt repeatedly.

Technology ensures that no centre exists in isolation.

Each one becomes part of a living global organism.

A network of movement.

A network of learning.

A network of belonging.

And as this network grows, something remarkable happens.

The distance between “local participation” and “global inspiration” disappears.

A child does not simply join a club.

They join a world.

CHAPTER 17

Creating the Champions of Tomorrow

Every sport is ultimately defined by one question:

Where do the next generation come from?

Without a pipeline, even the most popular sports slowly decline.

With a pipeline, even small sports can become global forces.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres vision places youth development at the centre of its architecture—not as an add-on, but as a foundational principle.

Because transformation at scale requires continuity across generations.

Children are not simply participants in this system.

They are its future structure.

Inside each centre, youth engagement is designed to feel natural, not forced.

Not elite-first.

But participation-first.

The early stages of development are not about specialization.

They are about discovery.

Movement.

Coordination.

Confidence.

Play.

As children grow, pathways begin to emerge.

Not as rigid tracks, but as opportunities.

Recreational participation.

Competitive progression.

Coaching and leadership development.

Academic integration through sport.

Scholarship pathways.

Elite performance training.

But the defining principle remains:

No child should feel that sport is reserved for someone else.

The barrier between “athlete” and “non-athlete” is intentionally softened.

Because most sporting potential is lost not through lack of talent, but lack of access and encouragement.

In this system, coaches become mentors.

Centres become environments of belonging.

And progression becomes a natural extension of participation.

Over time, something powerful happens.

A generation grows up for whom racquet sports are not unfamiliar.

They are normal.

They are part of life.

And when a sport becomes normal in childhood, it becomes culturally durable in adulthood.

That is how legacy is formed.

Not through elite performance alone.

But through widespread early adoption.

18. Women, Families, and the Growth Explosion

No movement reaches global scale without full inclusion of the human population it intends to serve.

And no sport can claim universality if it does not fully embrace women, families, and multi-generational participation.

The vision of the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres is intentionally structured around this principle.

Because participation is not complete unless it is shared.

Women's participation is not positioned as a category.

It is positioned as central expression.

The speed, intelligence, agility, and strategic depth of racquet sports naturally lend themselves to broad inclusion.

But inclusion does not happen automatically.

It is designed.

Encouraged.

Supported.

Visible.

Celebrated.

Families are not segmented within this model.

They are integrated.

Parents and children may play at different levels of intensity, but within the same ecosystem of movement and connection.

This creates something rare in modern life:

Shared activity across generations.

Where families do not simply attend the same place.

They participate in it together.

And when families share physical activity environments, something subtle but powerful begins to occur.

Communication improves.

Presence increases.

Time becomes more meaningful.

Health becomes collective rather than individual.

The centre becomes not just a sports facility, but a family anchor.

And from this inclusion comes what might be called the “growth explosion.”

Because when participation barriers are removed across gender, age, and skill level, adoption accelerates naturally.

Not through marketing alone.

But through lived experience.

A mother brings a child.

A child brings a friend.

A friend brings another family.

A family brings a community.

And suddenly, what began as a sport becomes a social ecosystem.

This is how scale actually happens.

Not from the top down.

But from the inside out.

19. The Professional Tour Reimagined

As participation expands at the community level, something else begins to evolve in parallel.

The professional expression of the sport.

Because no global movement is complete without a visible pinnacle.

But in this vision, professional sport is not isolated from community life.

It is an extension of it.

The professional tour becomes not a distant entertainment product, but the highest expression of a system that exists everywhere.

Players emerge from the same centres where children begin.

Audiences are connected to athletes they have watched develop over years.

Events are hosted within the same architectural ecosystem that defines daily participation.

This creates continuity of identity.

The professional game is no longer abstract.

It is familiar.

And familiarity builds engagement.

The tour itself becomes global, structured across continents, with major events acting as cultural moments within the broader ecosystem.

But the deeper transformation is psychological.

Because when people see elite athletes who came from the same environments they now inhabit, the ceiling of possibility disappears.

Aspiration becomes tangible.

Not theoretical.

This is how sports shift from entertainment to aspiration systems.

And aspiration systems sustain themselves across generations.

The professional game, in this vision, is not the centre.

It is the summit.

Visible.

Accessible.

And deeply connected to everything beneath it.

20. The Olympic Dream

Every sport that becomes globally meaningful eventually encounters the same question.

Not from within its own community, but from the world beyond it:

Does this belong on the world stage?

For racquet sports, and for the vision of the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres, the Olympic question is not just about prestige.

It is about recognition of human value.

Because the Olympics are not only a competition platform.

They are a cultural mirror of what humanity chooses to elevate.

In this vision, Olympic inclusion is not treated as a distant fantasy or marketing milestone.

It is treated as a natural outcome of scale, participation, and global relevance.

A sport becomes Olympic not because it demands attention.

But because it cannot be ignored.

And what cannot be ignored is participation at scale.

As NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres expand globally, the foundation of argument shifts.

Not “this is an emerging sport,” but:

“This is already embedded in daily life across nations.”

Children are playing.
Families are engaged.
Communities are built around it.
Athletes are emerging from established systems.
Global participation is measurable and growing.

At that point, recognition is no longer persuasion.

It is acknowledgment.

But beyond institutional validation, there is something more important at stake.

Visibility.

Because when a sport enters the Olympic arena, it enters the consciousness of billions.

And that visibility becomes acceleration.

Not just for elite athletes.

But for participation at every level beneath them.

Olympic status, in this vision, is not the destination.

It is a catalyst.

A signal to the world that what was once peripheral is now central.

21. More Players Than Soccer

There are statements that sound impossible until the systems behind them are understood.

The idea that racquet sports—anchored by the NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres—could one day produce more global participants than soccer is one such statement.

On the surface, it appears unrealistic.

But the vision is not based on surface comparison.

It is based on structural accessibility.

Soccer is globally dominant because it requires minimal equipment and space.

But racquet sports, when properly designed within indoor, year-round, community-integrated environments, offer something different:

Consistency.

All-weather accessibility.

Multi-age participation.

Higher intensity in shorter time periods.

Integrated wellness ecosystems.

And repeatable engagement within local infrastructure.

The key difference is not in popularity alone.

It is in frequency of participation.

A sport that is played casually once a week is fundamentally different from a system designed for daily engagement.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres are not built for occasional visits.

They are designed for lifestyle integration.

When participation becomes part of daily rhythm rather than scheduled recreation, scale changes fundamentally.

Growth no longer depends on major events or seasonal cycles.

It depends on embedded habit.

And habit scales faster than hype.

The vision is not to compete with soccer in its current form.

It is to redefine what global participation means when infrastructure is aligned with human behaviour rather than tradition.

If even a fraction of global urban populations adopt racquet sport participation through accessible centres, the numbers begin to converge quickly.

And once convergence begins, acceleration follows.

Not linearly.

Exponentially.

22. The NuVoWay Connection

At the deepest level, this entire vision is not about sport alone.

Sport is the entry point.

But not the destination.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres exist within a broader philosophy of human wellbeing—where movement, environment, community, and purpose are not separate categories of life, but integrated expressions of it.

Modern society often fragments these elements.

Health becomes separate from work.

Community becomes separate from activity.

Fitness becomes separate from lifestyle.

Purpose becomes separate from daily routine.

The NuVoWay vision seeks to reverse that fragmentation.

By embedding movement into environment.

By embedding connection into structure.

By embedding wellness into routine life.

Racquet sports provide the physical foundation.

But the system extends outward:

Recovery spaces.

Learning environments.

Social connection zones.

Family integration areas.

Mind-body wellness programming.

Youth mentorship pathways.

In this model, health is not something pursued.

It is something lived.

And when health becomes lived rather than scheduled, sustainability increases dramatically.

The centres become more than places to exercise.

They become places where life is practiced intentionally.

Where people do not escape their lives to improve themselves.

They enter environments that help them live better versions of their lives directly.

And over time, this creates a cultural shift.

From fragmented living.

To integrated living.

From isolated effort.

To shared participation.

From occasional wellness.

To continuous wellbeing.

And at the centre of it all remains a simple, consistent truth:

Movement is not optional to human flourishing.

It is foundational.

23. A New Economic Model

Every large-scale transformation eventually encounters a practical question:

How does it sustain itself?

Vision alone does not build infrastructure.

Systems do.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres model is not designed as a single-source enterprise.

It is designed as a distributed ecosystem.

One that allows participation from multiple stakeholder groups:

Entrepreneurs.

Coaches.

Investors.

Municipal partners.

Health professionals.

Educational institutions.

Each centre becomes a local node in a global network.

Not owned by one entity in isolation.

But operated through aligned participation in a shared philosophy.

This creates scalability without central overload.

And resilience without dependence on a single point of control.

Revenue streams are not limited to sport participation.

They expand into:

Membership ecosystems.
Youth development programs.
Community wellness initiatives.
Corporate wellness partnerships.
Event hosting.
Educational programming.

But the deeper economic principle is not diversification alone.

It is alignment.

When people participate in environments they value, and return regularly because of lived benefit, sustainability becomes organic.

Not forced.

The economic model, therefore, is not extractive.

It is participatory.

And participation strengthens both community and viability simultaneously.

In this way, the system supports itself by becoming useful at multiple levels of human need:

Physical.
Social.
Emotional.
Developmental.
Community-based.

And when utility aligns with purpose, sustainability follows.

J24. Awakening Heaven on Earth Through Sport

At some point, every vision either remains practical or becomes philosophical.

This one becomes both.

Because beneath all structure, strategy, architecture, and expansion, there remains a deeper question:

What is this ultimately for?

The answer, within the context of the mountain vision, is not simply sport expansion.

It is human renewal.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres are not only designed to grow participation.

They are designed to restore something that modern life has quietly eroded:

Connection.

To body.

To others.

To community.

To purpose.

Sport becomes the medium through which this restoration occurs.

Because play is one of the most natural expressions of being human.

It bypasses status.

It bypasses ideology.

It bypasses complexity.

It brings people into presence.

And in presence, something shifts.

Not just physically.

But internally.

The phrase “Awakening Heaven on Earth Through Sport” is not presented here as abstraction.

It is used as a way of describing what happens when human beings experience movement, beauty, and community in alignment.

Life feels more coherent.

More connected.

More meaningful.

Not because external circumstances have changed entirely.

But because internal experience has been reoriented.

This is the deepest layer of the vision.

Not global domination of a sport.

But global restoration of engagement with life itself.

Through movement.

Through community.

Through shared experience.

And through environments designed not only for activity, but for transformation.

25. Against All Odds

There is a version of every story that can be measured in achievements.

Titles.

Degrees.

Victories.

Milestones.

And there is another version that can only be measured in continuity.

The continuity of a vision held over time.

Through change.

Through uncertainty.

Through seasons where nothing visible seems to be happening.

This is where the title of this book takes its final meaning.

Against All Odds is not only about winning in sport.

It is about sustaining belief in something larger than immediate evidence suggests.

It is about holding a vision that did not originate in ambition alone, but in encounter.

A boy in a YMCA gym.

A world championship in Sacramento.

A quiet academic path in veterinary medicine.

A professional life shaped by multiple disciplines.

And then a mountain in December 2003.

Seven days that reframed everything.

From that point forward, life is no longer simply a sequence of events.

It becomes a response.

To what was seen.

To what was understood.

To what was entrusted.

The NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres are not presented here as completed reality.

They are presented as continuation of that response.

A framework still unfolding.

A direction still moving.

A vision still alive.

And perhaps the most important truth of all is this:

Not everything seen on the mountain is meant to be completed by one person.

Some visions are carried.

Some are built over time.

Some are fulfilled in stages.

And some are fulfilled by generations who step into something they did not originate—but are invited to continue.

So the question the book ultimately leaves behind is not:

Was it achieved?

But rather:

Who will carry it forward?

EPILOGUE

The Next Mountain

The journey does not conclude with certainty.

It concludes with continuation.

Because vision, once received, does not remain static.

It moves.

It invites.

It expands.

And somewhere ahead—beyond present understanding—there remains another mountain.

Not necessarily one of solitude.

But one of responsibility.

Of execution.

Of patience.

Of building what has been seen in ways that future generations can recognize as inevitable only in hindsight.

The story of NuVoWay LifeStyle Centres has begun.

Not in buildings.

But in belief.

Not in scale.

But in clarity.

Not in completion.

But in calling.

And what remains now is not the end of the vision.

But its unfolding.

rossG3.ca